

So this is pretty simple, take everything I just said about “children” and apply it to your students.

That is basically it. Use the exact same context when talking to your students.

For every little concern they could possibly bring to you, you hit them with

“What Are You Going To Do About It?”

You can be polite, or you can be firm. You can use it in little circumstances or you can use it in big ones.

Here is your call to action again.

Very bluntly, do these things:

1. Put up a one page document in your classroom titled “Complaint department”
 - a. Below that type these words “What are you going to do about it?” in big block letters.
2. Use this on your students 3 times a day minimum. Make it a habit, a constant indoctrination and motto for your household.
 - a. You can’t say it enough times in one day.
 - b. You don’t need your kids to like it at first, or ever for that matter.
 - c. Ask the question, and don’t move forward with their complaint until they answer it. Be stubborn.
3. If you want to have fun, ask your co-workers this question.
4. If you want to be courageous, ask yourself. Your life will never be the same again. Trust me, I know this. If you have ever heard my story, you would know why.

To learn about Tom’s program and strategy for school staff and students

↓Click here ↓

<http://streetsmartcounselling.com/sp.asp?sptype=2>