

Boundaries Mindset for School Teachers

Behaving Like An Olympic Coach

This is a very easy and straight forward conversion to the teaching world. Essentially you are supposed to do EXACTLY what I recommended with the parents but do it to your students.

Just like the parents you will need to have a purpose or structure in your classroom you are working toward, then behave like an Olympic coach with your students to achieve that.

In the Olympics it is about getting to the medal podium and improving your times and scores.

In the home and family it is about cleanliness, responsibility, showing respect for others, moving forward in life, taking on problems like (mental illness, addiction, etc....)

In the classroom it is about being on time for class, listening and co-operating, actually doing the homework, and attendance.

How this applies to drugs, mental illness, and troubled behaviour:

When young people experience a classroom that teaches them whose boss, and have a teacher that can command respect and performance from them. Then those young people now have someone they can come to when they need help. Someone they can take seriously or someone to inspire them to be so useful they don't make super stupid decisions anyways. Strong and motivated teens typically don't fall apart and waste their lives to drugs.

Call to Action:

1. Read my call to action in the newsletter and do those steps.
2. Pass this email on to another teacher and tell them you would like to try this in your classroom, and ask them what they think.
3. Pass this email on to an administrator or department head, and say that you would like for me to come make a presentation to their staff and to their students and set everybody up with this message.
