

Boundaries Mindset for Family Services Staff

Using Boundaries Instead Of Punishments

This is a very easy and straight forward conversion to the family services world. Essentially you are supposed to do EXACTLY what I recommended with the parents but do it to your staff and clients.

Just like the parents you will need to have a purpose or structure in your agency you are working toward, then behave like a police officer with your staff and clients to achieve that.

With the Police it is about getting people to listen and behave within the law regardless of their emotional state or conflicting opinions.

In the home and family it is about cleanliness, responsibility, showing respect for others, moving forward in life, taking on problems like (mental illness, addiction, etc....)

In the agency it is about being on time for appointments, listening and co-operating, actually doing the work you ask your clients to do, and having your staff consistently reach through to the clients and not let clients waste the staff's time.

How this applies to drugs, mental illness, and troubled behaviour:

When young people experience a support worker that teaches them whose boss, and have a support worker that can command respect and performance from them. Then those young people now have someone they can come to when they need help. Someone they can take seriously or someone to inspire them to be so useful they don't make foolish decisions anymore. Inspired and motivated teens stand a fighting chance to pull themselves together and learn a way of life much different than what they are used to.

Call to Action:

1. Read my call to action in the newsletter and do those steps. Exactly as they are written.
2. Pass this email on to another agency worker and tell them you would like to try this in your office, and ask them what they think.
3. Pass this email on to an administrator or department head, and say that you would like for me to come make a presentation to their staff and to their clients and set everybody up with this message.
